Abstract

Rwanda, a nation deeply rooted in African cultural heritage, is increasingly engaging with global ethical debates through its philosophical discourse. The analysis draws upon existing literature, academic discourse, and expert interviews focusing on the integration of African philosophical thought with global ethical debates relevant to Rwanda's development challenges. Themes such as moral responsibility towards victims of genocide and sustainable environmental practices have emerged prominently in recent philosophical discussions. These themes reflect broader societal concerns about justice and ecological stewardship. African philosophy in Rwanda offers valuable insights for addressing contemporary ethical dilemmas, particularly regarding issues of reconciliation and sustainability. Policymakers should consider incorporating African philosophical perspectives into educational curricula and public policy to foster a more inclusive understanding of ethics. This could include integrating indigenous moral narratives with international frameworks.
