Abstract

African philosophy has gained increasing attention in global intellectual circles for its unique contributions to ethical discourse, reflecting diverse cultural perspectives and philosophical traditions. The analysis will draw on existing literature and case studies of Rwandan philosophers who engage with global ethical issues, emphasising the relevance of these contributions in a multicultural academic environment. The integration of African philosophical perspectives into Rwanda's ethical discourse not only enriches global debates but also serves as a model for other multicultural societies seeking to navigate complex moral challenges. Future research should explore how specific African philosophical traditions can be further integrated into diverse educational curricula and public policy frameworks, thereby broadening the scope of ethical inquiry.
