Abstract

Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) practices in multinational corporations (MNCs) have gained significant attention globally, particularly within emerging markets such as Angola, where regulatory frameworks and social expectations are evolving rapidly. The approach employed is a systematic review of academic papers, industry reports, and case studies that have explored CSR initiatives within Angola's business environment. This study underscores the importance of contextualizing CSR efforts within Angola's socio-economic landscape for effective and sustainable business operations. Recommendations include a focus on developing culturally sensitive CSR programmes, fostering stakeholder collaboration, and incorporating local social benefits into MNCs' global CSR agendas.
