Abstract

Business practices in African regions exhibit significant diversity due to varying historical contexts, political landscapes, and cultural influences. Egypt serves as a notable case study for comparative analysis within this context. The analysis will draw from secondary data sources such as academic journals, industry reports, and government publications. Qualitative content analysis will be employed to interpret the textual data. Egypt's experiences highlight how contextual factors profoundly shape business operations across Africa, offering valuable lessons for practitioners aiming to navigate diverse market conditions. Business leaders should consider the specific regulatory frameworks of their regions when developing global strategies. Policymakers might benefit from adopting a more region-specific approach in crafting national business policies.
