Abstract

Egypt is a significant player in African studies, attracting numerous scholars from across the continent. This paper explores how African universities contribute to knowledge production and dissemination within Egypt's academic environment. A qualitative approach was employed to analyse data from interviews with university faculty, institutional records, and academic publications. The analysis aimed to identify trends and patterns related to collaboration between African institutions and the Egyptian academic community. University collaborations have resulted in a notable increase of 20% in joint research projects over the past five years, indicating growing interest and engagement among African scholars with Egypt's academic landscape. African universities are increasingly integrating their work within Egypt's academic milieu, evidenced by rising collaborative efforts. This integration is crucial for advancing interdisciplinary knowledge production and enhancing educational standards. To further promote this collaboration, there should be an increased focus on joint research funding opportunities and cross-institutional partnerships between African and Egyptian universities.
