Abstract

Post-transition Uganda is navigating the challenges of consolidating constitutionalism and the rule of law in a complex socio-political landscape. The analysis employs a qualitative approach to interpret data from legislative documents, policy papers, and interviews conducted with key stakeholders in government and civil society organizations. There is a notable trend towards the development of constitutional safeguards and judicial independence mechanisms aimed at enhancing legal certainty and accountability. Despite progress, significant gaps remain in translating constitutional provisions into effective governance practices, particularly concerning access to justice for marginalized groups. The implementation of robust oversight bodies and enhanced public education campaigns are recommended to bridge the gap between law and practice.
