Abstract

Rwanda has implemented significant land law reforms aimed at enhancing tenure security for its diverse population, including rural and urban dwellers. The analysis is grounded in a review of existing legislative changes and scholarly literature focusing on land law reform trajectories across Africa, with specific attention to Rwanda's context. These reforms are crucial for stabilising property rights and fostering sustainable development in a country with historically dynamic land relations. Further research should explore the practical implementation of these reforms to gauge their effectiveness in promoting equitable and secure land tenure across Rwandan society.
