Abstract

This study examines the legal systems in Egypt within the broader context of African constitutional law, focusing on comparative perspectives. A comparative research approach was employed, involving a literature review and case studies from selected African nations to identify shared legal principles and divergent practices within Egyptian law. Findings indicate that while there are notable similarities in constitutional structures across the region, Egypt exhibits unique features influenced by historical and cultural contexts. The study concludes with insights into how these comparative analyses can inform future legal reforms in Egypt and contribute to a more unified African legal landscape. Recommendations include fostering regional cooperation on legal education and promoting harmonization of laws across borders for mutual benefit.
