Abstract

Nigeria's environmental laws have been in place for decades, yet enforcement remains inadequate due to a complex interplay between regulatory bodies and corporate entities. The analysis draws upon existing literature, case studies, and interviews conducted with stakeholders including government officials, non-governmental organizations, and affected communities. Corporate entities frequently circumvent compliance requirements through strategic loopholes and lobbying efforts, leading to persistent environmental degradation despite regulatory oversight. The review suggests the need for more stringent enforcement measures, enhanced transparency in corporate operations, and increased public participation in monitoring environmental performance.
