Abstract

Sub-Saharan Africa faces significant challenges in gender equality within legal frameworks, with Mozambique serving as a critical case study due to its unique socio-political context. The research employs a comprehensive review of existing legal documents, scholarly articles, and primary court decisions from Mozambique, supplemented by interviews with legal practitioners and gender activists. The theoretical framework underscores the need for enhanced judicial training and community-level awareness programmes to bridge this gap and promote more equitable outcomes under existing legal frameworks. Specific recommendations include advocating for stronger accountability mechanisms within the judiciary, fostering collaboration between state institutions and civil society organizations, and conducting further research to identify best practices in gender-sensitive jurisprudence implementation.
