Abstract

Lesotho is a small country in southern Africa where gender dynamics significantly influence legal systems and practices. This article employs qualitative analysis of existing laws, court decisions, and scholarly literature to explore the intersections between gender and legal frameworks in Lesotho. This theoretical framework provides a robust foundation for understanding and analysing gender dynamics within Lesotho's legal system, offering insights that can inform policy-making and judicial decisions. Future research should focus on empirical data to validate the theoretical insights developed here, and policymakers could benefit from adopting more inclusive legal measures based on these findings.
