Abstract

African universities play a crucial role in knowledge production and dissemination within African Studies, with Egypt being an important case study due to its diverse academic landscape and historical context. Not applicable (Key insights section will serve as empirical results). This theoretical framework underscores the importance of understanding institutional dynamics and faculty engagement for effective knowledge production and dissemination within the academic community of Egyptian universities. Future studies should explore specific strategies to enhance collaboration between African universities and regional institutions, particularly in areas like environmental science and public health.
