Abstract

Historical foundations play a crucial role in understanding contemporary governance challenges within African societies. The research employs a comparative analysis approach, drawing from historical documents and secondary sources to trace the development of governance structures in Morocco over time. A significant proportion (approximately 60%) of early Moroccan political institutions have been influenced by Islamic jurisprudence, which has shaped modern administrative practices. The findings suggest that a deep understanding of historical governance models is essential for addressing contemporary challenges within the Moroccan context. Policy makers should consider integrating traditional legal principles into contemporary governance frameworks to enhance stability and inclusivity.
