Abstract

Religious pluralism in West Africa includes diverse religious communities such as Muslims, Christians, and indigenous beliefs. South Africa serves as a case study for understanding inter-faith dynamics due to its multicultural heritage. A qualitative research approach was employed through literature review and interviews with policymakers and religious leaders to understand current policies and their effectiveness. Inter-faith dialogues have shown significant improvement in understanding among communities despite occasional conflicts over cultural practices. Policy frameworks need more inclusive language and community engagement mechanisms. Current inter-faith policies are effective but require reinforcement with proactive inclusionary measures to prevent future conflicts. Incorporate religious diversity training for educators, promote interfaith dialogues as part of the national curriculum, and establish a national council for inter-religious unity.
