Abstract

Pan-Africanism is a political ideology advocating for unity among African nations, transcending national boundaries. In Namibia, post- era policies have aimed to address historical inequalities and promote Pan-Africanist values. A comparative study using qualitative data from interviews with government officials, civil society leaders, and academic experts to assess the impact of Pan-Africanist policies. Pan-Africanist initiatives have led to significant improvements in infrastructure development, particularly in rural areas, but face resistance due to cultural and economic disparities. While fostering unity and social cohesion, Pan-Africanism in Namibia faces challenges related to resource allocation and community acceptance. Enhanced communication strategies and targeted support programmes are recommended to address identified challenges effectively.
