Abstract

Post-colonial Liberia is a context where African philosophy has evolved significantly, shaped by historical legacies and contemporary challenges. The study employs a comparative approach, analysing texts by prominent Liberian philosophers alongside works from other African countries to identify commonalities and differences in philosophical thought. A key finding is the emergence of a distinct Liberian philosophical school that blends indigenous wisdom with modern critical perspectives, evident in the work of [Specific Author Name]. The comparative analysis reveals dynamic shifts in Liberian philosophy, reflecting both continuity and innovation within the broader African context. Future research should explore how these evolving philosophies influence social policies and community development initiatives in Liberia.
