Abstract

Corporate accountability under environmental law is critical for sustainable development in Nigeria, where enforcement compliance remains a significant challenge. A structured questionnaire was distributed to a diverse sample of Nigerian corporations, government officials, and civil society organizations. Respondents were asked about their experiences with corporate accountability measures under environmental law. The survey revealed that only 35% of respondents reported full compliance with environmental regulations, highlighting the need for enhanced enforcement mechanisms. While there is room for improvement in terms of regulatory effectiveness and stakeholder engagement, the findings suggest a critical gap in enforcing corporate accountability under environmental law in Nigeria. This research recommends strengthening enforcement bodies' capacity, enhancing public participation in decision-making processes related to environmental compliance, and promoting transparency in corporate practices.
