| Abstract

Background: A research gap exists in African Studies regarding the cultural adaptation and resilience of Southern African migrant communities in Egypt during 2004. Purpose and objectives: This policy brief aims to clarify key debates, identify practical policy implications, and outline a focused agenda for subsequent scholarship and intervention. Methodology: The analysis employed a review of relevant national and regional policy documents from 2004. Findings: The analysis identified persistent structural constraints facing these communities. It also noted emerging, locally driven innovations in adaptation. The available evidence for 2004, however, was found to be uneven across different community contexts and sectors. Conclusion: The findings underscore the necessity for context-specific policy approaches and highlight the need for a stronger empirical foundation in future research on this topic. Recommendations: Policymakers and stakeholders should prioritise inclusive strategies grounded in local realities. They should also commit to improving the transparency and systematic collection of relevant data. Key words: Cultural adaptation, resilience, migrant communities, Southern Africa, Egypt, African Studies, policy brief Contribution statement: This structured abstract provides a standardised summary to support the rapid screening, indexing, and assessment of the policy brief's content.
