Abstract

Land law reforms in Rwanda have been a critical component of broader socio-economic development initiatives aimed at reducing poverty and enhancing agricultural productivity. No empirical data or results are presented; instead, this article employs a comprehensive literature review and conceptual analysis to develop a theoretical framework for understanding the impacts of land law reforms on tenure security in Rwanda. The theoretical framework underscores the importance of aligning local customs and legislation to ensure equitable distribution of land resources while mitigating conflicts over tenure issues. Future research should focus on assessing the long-term impacts of these legal changes, particularly in terms of economic development and social stability within Rwanda's diverse landscapes.
